The changes in the concentrations of Tissue Polypeptide Antigen (TPA) were investigated in the sera of patients with lung cancer, and were correlated to clinical stage and survival. The median serum TPA concentration was significantly higher in the lung cancer patients (33.6 +/- 23.1 ng/ml) than in normal controls (22.1 +/- 12.7 ng/ml, p less than 0.05), but no correlation was found with the clinical stage of the disease. No significant difference was observed in serum TPA concentration between small cell lung cancer (SCLC) and non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC). A follow-up of 51 lung cancer patients for 6-84 months (median 44 months) showed that the survival time was longer for patients with serum TPA levels less than 37 ng/ml than for those with levels of 37 ng/ml or more. TPA levels of 37 ng/ml or more seemed to be a more important prognostic factor than stage. We are a small community of carers and friends who are trying to make a difference to the world we live in. When we began looking for a carer in Cavan or Donegal we realised that there were many people who have dedicated their lives to caring for others who are unable to care for themselves, but they are not easily able 82157476af
